

Dear Bradley,

I want you to take a moment and reflect on the journey you've been on with Kim over the past 5+ years – navigating the winding and unpredictable road that is life with PNH.

You've always admired Kim's strength. Once the diagnosis came, her resilience never wavered. You watched her adjust to a new normal – routine infusions, always needing to manage her health. You saw how she leaned on her friends and family, and how she allowed herself to be vulnerable, and how that opened the door to being truly supported.

PNH is invisible in many ways – it doesn't show itself on the outside. Yet, it changed so much for her.

But what stood out to you time and time again was how Kim refused to let PNH define her. It became part of her life, but never her whole life.

Through it all, your relationship with Kim deepened. You got closer. You saw the strength which she advocated – not just for herself, but for others. She inspired people to speak up, to fight for their care, to believe in something better. Watching her changed you. This experience made you more present, more empathetic, and more grounded.

Even when the road is bumpy, it's still worth traveling. Her strength, humility, and determination will continue to inspire you every day. Keep walking beside her. Keep showing up – wherever the road may lead.

Sincerely, Bradley
